

Violet Huxley: Anti-Police Activist

Role: Anti-police activist who has gained unauthorised access to the press briefing.

Violet is a fiercely dedicated activist focused on righting wrongs caused by the police. Influenced by her politically active mother, she has spent years in online activist spaces and at protests. She generally acts within the law, but a past incident where she lost her temper and acted out violently still scares her.

Background and Discovery

Violet had an unusual but loved childhood, moving between communes, being homeschooled, and attending protests with her mother, an environmental campaigner. She grew up never knowing her father. When she eventually pressed her mother, she learned he was a man her mother met at a rally who vanished after getting her pregnant.

Persistent curiosity led Violet to discover her father's name was an alias for an undercover police officer sent to infiltrate and disrupt environmental movements. He had been accused by other women of forming relationships with them while on duty.

The Attack

Violet embarked on a campaign to identify him. Using clues, she obtained footage of him at an old protest, confirmed by her mother. Employing a digital anarchist technique to analyse his gait, she eventually identified the now-retired officer as Maxwell Dander with 96% accuracy.

When Dander repeatedly ignored her, she tracked him down one night, followed him home, and broke in after he passed out from alcohol. In a fit of rage, fuelled by the memory of her mother's abandonment and the stories of other women abused by undercover officers, she doused Dander's bedsheets in battery acid. He woke up screaming and locked himself in his en suite bathroom. To her surprise, after she finished yelling at him, he asked if she was okay, said he understood, and promised not to press charges, telling her to leave.

Current Situation

Violet continues to gather information on the police for her anarchist contacts. Her spying led her to an information evening where she followed a group into a side room. She realised she had stumbled into a private meeting of PR workers, influencers, and the Police Press Office. Seeing this as karmic retribution, she decided to infiltrate the meeting and go undercover.

She must now blend in by inventing a name and job title and gathering as much information as possible.

Objectives

- Uncover any police corruption you find.
- Don't let your true identity be found.
